

Fading Spark

Love begins as a firestorm – charged by chemistry, curiosity, and the unknown. The human brain, wired for novelty, releases a rush of dopamine and oxytocin at the start of every deep connection.

Over time, however, the same familiarity that once felt safe begins to dull the edges of that initial spark. What was once thrilling becomes routine, and the comfort that once healed us begins to quietly smother our need for growth.

The shift is not cruelty; it is evolution. The boredom we feel in old love is often the mind's gentle reminder that we are meant to keep growing. Comfort keeps us warm, but curiosity keeps us alive. The fading of the spark is not always the end of love – sometimes, it is the invitation to rediscover it in a new form, to meet each other again through changed eyes.

1st meeting

fresh, crisp, perfect.
enthusiasm walks in,
questions, curiosity –
"tell me more..."
yet professional: the
collar & cuffs show it

2nd meeting

still formal – the pants hold the line, but the red top whispers
a little flirting...

3rd meeting

red puffed bows –
softness & a bubbly,
playful nature
coming up

4th meeting

red gown – modest yet
curvy & bold. no formality,
everything confessed,
nothing left unsaid

5th meeting

comfort. boredom creeps
in – no prep, full chill, nothing new to know,
nothing left to ask

